The Sorbian Institute is thoroughly integrated into the German research landscape, although with its dual focus on Sorbian cultural research and its practical support for Sorbian language and culture it can be considered as unique. This dual focus expresses the institute's understanding of its contemporary role based on dialogue between science and society. This results in the following capacities which can be used as added value in doctoral networks:

- Knowledge building, especially through digitisation projects on regional tangible and intangible cultural heritage
- Experience in the scientific monitoring of social change, especially with a focus on rural areas (e.g. by conducting field reports and emergency inventories, and accompanying research in the context of open-cast mining or by evaluating schools and language trainings)
- Close interaction with civil society actors, municipalities and institutions in the region

The research interests focus on transcultural and intercultural phenomena on minorities and within minority regions in Europe, including bilingualism and multiculturalism, history of the relationship between minority and majority, ethnic conflicts and dialogic encounters in historical and contemporary perspectives, and handling diversity and otherness. This results in the following fields of action for cooperation:

- Preserving cultural diversity and enhancing the regional cultural (including linguistic) heritage
- Developing/strengthening regional identities in dialogue with local and civil society actors
- Activating cultural resources for regional development strategies
